

Contributor: Christina Andersson

Current Function:

Date: 2013/04/06

Subject: Making Public Governance Work for the Post-2015 Development Agenda

As a human rights activist and researcher, I have found out different ways to create a global change related to the post-2015 development agenda.

First of all I believe that we must, through very strong cooperating between developed and developing countries, make sure there is possibility for education for all.

With education for all I mean a proper education not less because this is the first and I believe most important step to a global change.

Through this movement we will have voices raising and so we will understand how to create a better sustainable development for all. And also how to end poverty and violence, our next step to peace.

But this demands that we are listening. If we don't listen to the childrens and the youths voices we will never be able to understand the future that they want because the future is not today it is the day of tomorrow, our children.

Here we can learn so much about what is actually happening in this technology world.

This world that is moving much more quickly then ever before.

But If we don't give them a proper education will we never even think about to listen to their voices. This is so sad but most times the truth

Education is also a way to encourage people to claime their rights because then trough this step they will be aware of them.

Another issue that is very important, is the coordination between decision makers and the vulnerable it means reality is here very important to save both money and lives.

And here is the time that we use the public governance because it is necessary to implement global ideas. We got to learn from each other.

One way is to use culture exchange. We introduce our culture and will recieve a different culture and learn how people are thinking, acting and living which is a very important knowledge for peacement.

We all belong to this planet therefore its extremely important that we share knowledge, good and bad with each other.

Making public governance might be the way for people to get more motivated to participate in different issues for developing.

I would also say that to make this work we have to create a new system.

A system based on humanity, equality, respect, love and justice. True justice.

We have to create a system based on trust. It is extremely important that we learn how to trust each other, that means it is time to start all over again from the beginning.

We need a new system where the family are giving most worth and respect.

Where the children are seen as individuals and where they are able to speak.

We need a system that creates work for everyone with fewer hours work and more hours for living and spending with their families, because I believe it is only a matter of planning, careeing then it will be enough for all of us to live a descent life.

To make this happen we have to change the ethos of the people.

Today the time has come. Disasters are making the people afraid and also aware of that something must happen for betterment.

We must use this movement and implement love, respect joy and convince the people that they must start thinking in another way to save this klima and the entire world.

Starting today with equality, education for all, justice and questioning; Was this all?

There must be more for me then just working, eating sleeping? Is this living? Is this the life that we human where created for?

Or

Is there other challenges? Possibilities? Ways? Of living?

And there we have the key global change.

Christina Andersson